infancy. Relational trauma thus can be understood as the quintessential expression of "complex trauma," which has been defined as "repeated interpersonal trauma occurring during crucial developmental periods" (Lanius et al., 2011, p. 2). More recently I have expanded the model of the developmental and 3

Relational Trauma, Brain Development, and Dissociation

The relational model of trauma (Scheeringa & Zeanah, 2001) proposes that infants' trauma symptoms may be influenced by their mothers' trauma symptoms and disruptions in caregiving behavior, although the mechanisms by which this occurs are less well understood.

Relational trauma in the context of intimate partner violence

In other words failures of structural development occur in relational trauma that includes or does not include physical trauma to the brain. In human infancy, purely "psychological" relational trauma leads to altered brain development, and purely "neurological" trauma negatively impacts relational development.
